The police got my name, what should I do now?

Better talk with your friends before an action about possible consequences and strategies. After police contact, you should definitely start thinking about your next steps. Here are some good ideas to start with:

- write a memory log
- contact the local anti-repression group (more information below)
- talk with the other involved people about next steps

I've received a letter, what should I do?

After cops recorded your personal data, it usually takes a long time till you hear from them again. Usually it is a subpoena saying that you should come to the police station to be questioned. In that case you should not say anything, you can only make it worse for yourself and others. Better bring your letter to an anti-repression group, they will help you.

Sometimes they directly send a penalty order. They try to declare you as guilty without a court hearing. You should appeal immediately - it's enough to do it via an informal letter within a week. And of course go to the anti repression group.

If you get a letter or the police stands in front of your door, never forget that you are not alone. Repression is supposed to divide us and make us feel defenseless. It can be helpful to talk about it. Remember: solidarity is our weapon!
